Ever since I got a phone, I've always taken photos of everything, capturing my life in vivid detail. Once I started to value creativity, I ran with it and got into video editing. I blew up on TikTok and got a job with a makeup company. They brought me to New York for a work trip, and I fell in love with the city; everything changed for me. Around that time, I began exploring film photography and started bringing a camera to our shoots. I met a photographer who went by @stolenbesos who shot everything on a point-and-shoot digital camera. That changed everything for me. Up until then, I thought photography had to be this really complicated thing. She was making a full living shooting people with a point-and-shoot before the whole Canon G7X boom. I bought one early before the price blew up, and moved to New York right after that three years ago.

I told myself I would make it as a photographer no matter what. I started meeting everyone, getting small jobs, and doing a lot of behind-the-scenes work for different people and projects, and slowly building my own work from that. From there, people started asking me to shoot. I did personal projects for people, worked with artists and musicians, and from that, I found a style. I got accepted into Parsons. I learned real technique and lighting skills, and once I had that portfolio, Bruised

– an independent clothing brand – reached out to me. They asked me to do one shoot for them, and I decided to go about it differently. I planned the shoot in a very organized and intentional way, focusing on the deliverables I could give them rather than just shooting clothes. They liked it and kept asking for more shoots, and then asked what else I could do. I said yes to everything and took on a lot of freelance work for them. After a few months, they said they wanted to bring me on full-time in-house. Now I work for them consistently, and it has been great.

For anyone trying to get out there with photography, start with what you already have. Do the best work you can with the gear you have. Once you feel comfortable with your camera, push yourself to learn actual technique. Push yourself to be technical because that is what gives you freedom and consistency. Additionally, shoot behind-the-scenes footage for people. From there, take risks and take chances on yourself. That is my biggest advice. That is exactly how I met everyone. As a behind-the-scenes photographer, you meet every single person on set because you are literally shooting everything. You introduce yourself to everyone, get their contacts, and they always want the photos you take. It is the best way to network and make real connections.
