Racooties is a game I made as part of a game jam. If you don't know what a game jam is, think of it as an equivalent to 48 hour film festivals but for games in the sense that it is an event where you have a time limit to execute and make a game that fits the theme of that game jam.

Our school threw one as a collaboration between two clubs, and the theme was halloween/fall, so myself and some of my other illustration and coding friends joined together to make this game. It is a 2D top down visual narrative that follows the story of a guy named Connor who is cursed with a disease called Racooties that makes him into a racoon, and if he does not get the antidote in 24 hours he will be a racoon forever. Although I was part of every creative process to an extent, my main portion is the boss battle which I fully coded by myself from scratch. This is probably my proudest project of the year, and for someone who didn't make games before 3 months ago, I am very proud that this is something I can add to my portfolio and call mine.

Second Game - Performative Male Simulator:

This is a game I made a little earlier in the year where I had to make a game that was UI interactive, meaning that it mainly consisted of screen type play rather than moving around. For this game, I just wanted to have fun and so I used the popular meme of the Performative Male going around to simulate the experience of raising a performative male and seeing what happens when it grows up. It is a short but fun experience.

Third Game - Dungeon Crawler:

This game was also an experimental project, as it was the first time I started experimenting with movement and the theme of "bullet hell," which is avoiding enemies to try and stay alive. The main objective of the game is just to surpass the 3 main levels and avoid enemies without dying. If you pass all 3 levels you win, if you fail, you lose, simple as that. It may not be a fully finished game with lore and stuff, but it is a game I am still proud of simply because it took me a long time to figure out how the enemy interaction worked, and once I got it, it was the best feeling.

try it for yourself
